Formal Report to UQ

UQ can investigate incidents within the scope of the Policy. You can make a formal report in person to the SMSU or via the online portal. It is completely your choice if you want to make a formal report or not. There is no time limit on making a formal report. The SMSU can guide you through this process.

You can access support throughout this process and regardless of the outcome.

1. Your formal report is passed to the Academic Registrar, or the Chief Human Resources Officer who will decide on how the report will be investigated.
2. If an investigation is required, it may involve separate interviews with you, the accused and other relevant people. You can have a support person with you through this process.
3. An investigative report will be provided to the Academic Registrar, or Chief Human Resources Officer and/or Head of Organisational Unit who will decide on the next steps or actions in line with the Policy.
4. You will be notified at the conclusion of the investigation, although the University may be unable to communicate any disciplinary or other sanctions that may result from further action.

Informal, Anonymous and/or Third Party

You can make an informal, report in person to the SMSU or via the online portal. UQ may be unable to take direct action in response to an informal report. However, all information is taken seriously and informs the University's approaches to sexual misconduct prevention and response.

Police

Reporting to the Police is separate from reports to the University and may lead to legal proceedings. Reporting to the Police will not affect your access to support or reporting at UQ. The SMSU can support you through this process.

Ongoing Support

The SMSU can help you with counselling, academic support and other 'reasonable measures' on an ongoing basis, regardless of if you decide to make a formal report and regardless of the outcomes of a report.
